8. THE CAUSE OF WORLD FAMINE

The rest of my trip home was more of the same. My parents expressed their concern for my broken marriage, my lackluster career, my teenage taste in clothing, my inability to make poor life choices, my health, my income, my car, my house hanging over Colchester Canyon, and the general waste and misuse that defined me in their eyes. I could feel myself cracking under the withering expression of their love and worry. They were correct: it wasn't too late to right the ship.

I could still go to law school. I'd be forty-one when I graduated. Plenty of time to fill a pension fund, find a wife, and raise a Bergen County family. I could sell my house, move to Parisius, and live with my parents while I attended law school in the City. I could sell my 1970 Mustang convertible too. My parents played bridge on Tuesdays with Len Rosenberg, owner of the largest Volvo dealership in North America. Len would happily help me out. I could join a gym, take up golf, get a haircut, and learn to play bridge. Len would welcome me into their Tuesday game with open arms. My wife would adore the Rosenbergs. My kids would thrive in the Bergen County school system. My father, retired by the time they were born, would oversee the straightening of their teeth by Len Rosenberg's son, Andrew, who was my father's junior partner and had a contractual agreement to buy the practice when my father
